Can attacks against embassies serve as basis for the invocation of self-defence?

In 1979, the case of the Tehran hostages not only shook the world, but its reverberations also trembled the fundamental concepts enshrined in Article 51 of the UN Charter. Since the ill-fated US rescue attempt, which was dubbed as self-defence, several claims of self-defence stemmed from attacks against embassies. These arguments received ambiguous responses from the international community and from publicists as well. States' reactions mainly exhibited political considerations. Meanwhile, publicists' views were based either on policy arguments or on general rules of international law, mostly to the extent of a footnote to a monography, lacking a thorough analysis of practice.

Against this backdrop, Gergö Balázs will discuss a paper which he co-authors with Gábor Kajtár LL.M (Cantab), senior lecturer at Eötvös Loránd University, Faculty of Law. Their research aims at the clarification of the contradicting views surrounding the invocation of self-defence in case of attacks against diplomatic and consular missions. Their research argues for a restrictive interpretation of the use of force, that is, for the rejection of self-defence in these cases. Restrictive interpretation is not only a methodological starting point, but also a conclusion supported by scholarly arguments concerning the unsatisfied basic criteria of self-defence (such as necessity and the de minimis) and corroborated by state practice where these are regarded as criminal actions and response is sought under the regime of diplomatic and consular law.

A comprehensive analysis of theoretical viewpoints underpins this research, the biggest novelty of which is the thorough rereading of the primary sources, the rigorous dogmatic approach and the extensive examination of state practice. The study includes an overview of 651 attacks against missions and state reactions compared against the self-defence reports submitted to the Security Council.
