Central banks are now suffering from a crisis in public confidence and public legitimacy. I see this crisis of legitimacy as a problem of culture as much as it is a problem of law. To address it, we need a new concept of financial citizenship and a new collaboration between experts and public.” (Annelise Riles)

Annelise Riles is Executive Director of the Buffett Institute for International Studies and Associate Provost for International Affairs, as well as Professor of Law and Professor of Anthropology (by courtesy) at Northwestern University. Her research concerns the culture of legal institutions and she has conducted extensive field research in international organizations and in the global financial markets.